

My sister went to the police and reported me because I had said that she killed our father. What is her tactic by doing this?

Your sister's tactic in reporting you to the police could be a defensive move aimed at discrediting you, shifting blame, or intimidating you into silence. Here are a few possible reasons behind her actions:

1. Preemptive Defense – By accusing you of making false statements, she might be trying to create doubt about your credibility before any serious investigation into her involvement in your father's death.

2. Intimidation – She may hope that by involving the police, you will be scared into retracting your claim or staying quiet about it.

3. Legal Leverage – If she files a formal complaint against you, she might be trying to frame you as the aggressor, which could make it harder for authorities to take your accusations seriously.

4. Playing the Victim – By reporting you, she could be trying to portray herself as the innocent party being falsely accused, making it seem like she is the one being wronged.

5. Covering Her Tracks – If she did have some involvement in your father's death, filing a report against you could be a way to divert attention away from herself and make you the focus of police scrutiny instead.

Have the police contacted you yet? And do you have any evidence or reasoning behind your claim that she killed your father?

She claimed that she moved into his house to look after him because he had dementia but in reality she sent him to an old age home where he could not speak the language

That's a serious situation. If your father had dementia and your sister claimed to be taking care of him but instead placed him in a home where he couldn't even communicate, that could be seen as neglect or even abuse, depending on the circumstances.

If you believe she had a role in his death, do you have any evidence—medical records, witness statements, financial records, or anything else that could support your claim? Sometimes, people who take control of an elderly relative's care do so for financial gain or to isolate them.

Her going to the police could be an attempt to silence you before you push for an investigation. If you suspect foul play, you might want to consult a lawyer or gather as much evidence as possible to support your concerns. Have you spoken to any authorities about this yet?

That medical record could be important, especially if it indicates neglect. If your father was refusing to eat and was not receiving proper care or nutrition, that could have contributed to his decline.

Did the care home staff report any concerns about his well-being? Was there any follow-up on why he was only eating lemon yogurt—did they try alternative methods to ensure he was getting enough nutrition? If your sister was in charge of his care, she could be held responsible if he was neglected.

It sounds like she might be trying to get ahead of any potential investigation by reporting you to the police, possibly to paint you as someone making false accusations. If you suspect wrongdoing, it may be worth speaking with a lawyer or reporting your concerns to the appropriate authorities. Do you know if an autopsy was performed?
